Principal Researcher, WolfBrown

Dr. Dennie Palmer Wolf (Principal, WolfBrown) holds a doctorate from Harvard where she served as a researcher at Project Zero for more than a decade and then headed Harvard PACE, a project examining how students become actively culturally engaged in their communities. She has led multiple projects and collective impact evaluation studies that helped cities (Boston, Dallas, Portland, and others), cultural organizations, and communities examine and improve how people gain access to learning, culture, and creativity both in and outside of formal institutions. More recently, she has pioneered innovative approaches to program design and evaluation for institutions as varied as Carnegie Hall, The Kennedy Center, Lincoln Center Institute, and multiple small and mid-sized cultural organizations working at the intersection of the arts, equitable opportunities, and social justice.
